Knowing these basics will allow you to apply Photoshop as a solution to whatever you need to solve—be it image cropping, resizing, adjusting color, brightness, and contrast, removing unwanted objects, or even photo compositing. I've written this tutorial based on my own experience using Photoshop, but the basics are the same in all major editions of the program. Once you've done the basics, you'll want to learn more advanced techniques, such as using Photoshop's Brush Tool, Draw Tool, and Content-Aware Move Tool. Get started! Important! The following instructions assume you have Photoshop CS6 or earlier, and that you're using a keyboard and mouse. You'll learn more about command-and-shortcut combinations in the Q & A section of the tutorial. In addition, some of the steps may be easier or more complicated if you're using a mouse. Layers are a type of visual grouping and layering of information. By default, Photoshop creates a new layer for every new file. This is the "Tertiary" layer which will remain added in the layer order. Layers can be expanded or retracted, so they're grouped together in a container - they're not piled on top of each other. You can keep your layers within a container for an easy overview of the different parts of a picture. 3. Layer Panel Right-click the layer thumbnail in the Layers Panel to change the visibility of the layer. Click on the eye icon to make the layer visible or hidden. Drag the layer to move it within the container. Click on the eye icon to make the layer visible. Click on the eye icon to make the layer hidden. Drag the layer to move it within the container. 4. There are many services where the concept of reality is an important part. In the case of online stores, the concept of reality becomes more and more important. Now you can order a product or share a product on any social platform in less than few seconds or minutes, without having to touch the product itself. This is the advantage of B2B e-commerce websites. The user interface must be intuitive enough for customers to immediately understand that everything is real and you have what they need. This is what we have discovered the last year through our combined experience with e-commerce websites for a large number of clients, not only at Organigram. E-commerce sales systems must also be able to implement dynamic business rules, according to the situation that the seller's business is undergoing at any given moment. Given the nature of the business, there is often a certain amount of flexibility in the rules. One example would be the number of days a seller will be allowed to receive products. Another example would be the number of packages required. There are cases of discounts, so the number of packages is reduced or the discount is adapted based on the quantity of packages. Given the difficulty of changing an existing system, we have decided to test our two most powerful e-commerce platforms to search for solutions to this problem. To keep the test as short as possible, we have only tested the Amazon and Shopify platforms, both to check the direction that they have taken and the possibility of modifying the system. The test lasted 3 months. The objective was to test the systems' dynamic interface, including the possibility of adding, modifying or deleting business rules. But beyond this, we also wanted to test the functionality of the systems and their overall performance. Results of the test The systems offer a wide range of functionalities. Each one has multiple tools that facilitate the management and the use of the platform. But the test demonstrates that they have their limits as well. The Amazon platform The platform has many tools available to the user, but only one of them is used for all the uses. These tools and functions are not organized or systematic enough. The Amazon platform offers some functions that are useful for marketing campaigns, such as the ability to quickly generate a Facebook ad or to send an email reminder to previous orders. The Amazon

"When you ask someone what were they doing in 2016," says Tristan D'Amour, VP of Technology at Stamp, "they may not remember the specifics of what they were working on that year, but they'll recognize the feeling of that year." Tristan joined Stamp earlier this year, putting the full force of his technological mind behind the company. What has he been up to? With his airtight plan, check it out: Make It Easier to Submit (and Make it Easier to Justify) Your Own Event The line between simple and professional is complex. Some things are correct or not, and it's easy to get caught up on trying to "do better" when doing things by the book can lead to more work. Like some of my favorite speakers say, "doing it right is not my goal; being smart is." Tristan's goal is not to do more work, but to make it easier for everyone else. He's built a system that makes "justifying an event" way easier, and he's made submitting events for all his clients in one place simple. When a client approaches him with their event, he has three options. The first is to update the events on their existing system. This is the "traditional" way, but does require a bit of work on their part. The second is to create a new event in their system. This can be really helpful if they don't have an existing system for their events. There's an add-on to the event tool so that they can add that to their existing system, and it allows them to make changes to that event. For these, he only charges $75. The third option is to pay for the service for $10,000, which can be totally justified. Tristan says "if a client comes to me and says, 'I want to create my event,' and then says, 'I need it in three days,' then I'll create it, do it, and do it now." Create Different Types of Submission Pages for Your Event Categories Now that Tristan's clients have their events created, he makes them available for others to see on their website. By adding different type of submissions pages, he can help his clients present all of their events in one
